

BMA PRESENTS TWO MAJOR VIDEO INSTALLATIONS BY ACCLAIMED ARTIST CANDICE BREITZ AS PART OF THE 2020 VISION INITIATIVE

Works Exploring the Dynamics of Power, Privilege, and Celebrity in Modern Culture Shown Together for the First Time

BALTIMORE, MD (January 30, 2020)—Critically acclaimed artist Candice Breitz is recognized around the world for her unflinching questioning of power and influence, especially as it relates to individual identity. In March, The Baltimore Museum of Art (BMA) will present Candice Breitz: Too Long, Didn't Read, the spring season anchor of the museum's year-long 2020 Vision initiative highlighting works by female-identifying artists. The exhibition features two of Breitz's powerful multi-channel video installations, TLDR and Love Story, both of which examine how our contemporary obsession with celebrity and the explosion of media have distorted our ability to connect with real-world humanitarian issues and empathize with the experiences of those living on the margins of society. Presented side-by-side for the first time, the works represent more than 35 hours of content that captures Breitz's essential voice as an artist and interrogator of contemporary culture.

Candice Breitz: Too Long, Didn't Read is on view at the BMA March 15–July 12, 2020. This major ticketed exhibition is curated by Asma Naeem, the BMA's Eddie C. and C. Sylvia Brown Chief Curator, and will be accompanied by a range of public programs that delve more deeply into the human rights issues highlighted in Breitz's works. The exhibition is generously sponsored by the Alvin and Fanny B. Thalheimer Exhibition Endowment Fund and The Hardiman Family Endowment Fund.

“Candice Breitz’s installations ask critical questions about whose voices matter, whose are to be believed, and how we should respond. In a moment when discussions about ‘fake news’ and the impact of social media on civil discourse are proliferating our national dialogues, Breitz’s installations feel ever more prescient, relevant, and illuminating,” said Christopher Bedford, BMA Dorothy Wagner Wallis Director. “We hope that these installations will engage our visitors and encourage them to connect with Breitz’s practice and also with each other—and that they will return to the exhibition more than once to experience the full scope of the presentation.”

In the two-part multi-channel installation TLDR (2017), Breitz captures the stories of a community of sex workers in Cape Town, South Africa, and the bitter, often misplaced, cultural debates surrounding sex work and the rights of those working in the trade. In the first gallery, a 12-year-old narrator shares the story of a clash between Amnesty International, which began advocating for the global decriminalization of sex work in 2015, and a coalition of Hollywood celebrities and sex work abolitionists. A modern Greek chorus of sex workers further animates the narration through dance movements and the use of protest signs. The story is also accompanied by a soundtrack rich in protest songs and emoji-inflected digital imagery, drawing on the alluring visual tactics employed by the Internet.

This stylized presentation is contrasted with 10 intimate interviews that capture the real-life struggle of sex workers to attain basic human rights. Through this intense juxtaposition, Breitz highlights the incredible ability of celebrities to assert power in a dialogue in which they have no experience or study, thus distorting the public conversation and leaving those most affected to deal with the ramifications. TLDR, the acronym for “too long; didn’t read,” which lends its name to the BMA’s exhibition, also speaks to our limited capacity to engage with complicated and layered subject matter—choosing instead to absorb only short-form and glossed-over information.

Love Story (2016) features two distinct presentations of the experiences of six individuals who have been through the atrocities of war, been forced to flee their homes, and deeply impacted by the international response, or lack thereof, to the growing global refugee crisis. In the first version, actors Alec Baldwin and Julianne Moore, each seated in front of a green screen, perform a series of fragments excerpted from a set of first-person accounts, totaling approximately 74 minutes. The second iteration includes nearly 22 hours of interviews with the subjects themselves: José Maria João, a former child soldier from Angola; Mamy Maloba Langa, a survivor of torture and abuse from the Democratic Republic of the Congo; Dr. Shabeena Saveri, a transgender activist from India; Professor Luis Nava, a political dissident from Venezuela; Farah Abdi Mohamed, a young atheist from Somalia; and Sarah Ezzat Mardini, a young woman who escaped war-torn Syria.

Together, the two versions encapsulate the dissonance between how, and by whom, stories are often told in the media. The installation asks the viewer to consider how we are so easily moved by fictionalized depictions of horrific events, and yet seem unable to connect with or mobilize to help those actually affected by these tragedies. At the same time, it underscores the sanitization, framing, and packaging of world events to fit the entertainment frameworks on which we thrive, posing broader questions about our sense of truth and reality.

“Breitz’s art mines the registers of human feelings buried within such seemingly insignificant online transactions as viewing, liking, posting, commenting, sharing, and the deluge of images and information about the profoundly unjust social conditions existing all around us. Even though her practice is deeply layered and complex, there is an incredible clarity to her work—an undeniable way that it reflects our daily reality back to us,” said Naeem. “We recognize it immediately, as well as our own complicity in the highly saturated culture of social media. She is posing essential questions, and ultimately it is on the viewer to determine how to engage and respond.”
